

Leading the Way to Greener Pastures

Control flies and other insects using strategies that can help minimize environmental threats.

July 2007

Concern about the health of our environment is rising, and many horse owners are part of the growing contingency of people stepping up to care for our planet. Maintaining healthy pastures, controlling runoff and implementing good manure management methods are just a few ways equestrians are making a difference.

Environmentally conscious horse owners are also looking for equine products and services that are friendlier toward our world. As a result, manufacturers of insect control products are providing alternatives to horse owners who really do want to be as environmentally responsible as possible. Here's a look at insect control strategies that help minimize environmental risks while still offering comfort to our horses throughout fly season.
